AN ELECTRIC TOWING SYSTEM.

A new system, which might be termed a marine monorail, does away with most of the disadvantages found in practice and is commercially superior to any system of towing used at present in Germany. The essential features of the invention are a single rail along the bed of the canal and a specially designed boat which when electrically propelled, takes its current from an overhead wire. The tugboat—one might almost call it a water trolley car—is a small vessel, at most thirty-three feet in length and ten feet wide. These dimensions are ample to provide sleeping and cooking facilities for the boatmen in case of day-and-night service. At the bottom of the boat is an opening surrounded by a tube of sheet iron, forming a shaft which is open at both ends. The operating device is hung up in this shaft and carries at its lower end two pairs of horizontally placed flat rollers which are kept about two feet above the bottom of the canal.

Upon the bottom of the channel is an iron bar; this is the rail of the system, and the method of anchoring it is one of the invention's unique features. The rail is not attached to the bed of the canal, but is held in place by means of metal arms that, at intervals, are themselves anchored along the edge of the canal bed. The anchoring device is jointed, so that the projecting arm may be raised and lowered, permitting a corresponding vertical movement of the rail that is attached to it. Since the power-boat is floated by the water of the canal there is no downward pressure upon the rail, it being used merely as a firm surface which the rotating rollers being provided with grooves into which the rail fits.

To operate the boat, the rail is raised until it can be grasped by the rollers; these are then caused to revolve by the motor, and a forward motion is thus imparted to the vessel. In the experimental installation the electric current was taken, as stated, from an overhead trolley, and conducted to a motor of the form and size used in ordinary street cars, but the power may also be generated within the boat itself by an oil engine.—Exchange.

Henry Dorman, 115 years of age, who died recently at his home in Missouri, served in both the Mexican and Civil wars and had records to prove both his age and his war service.
